

The CURB Pollution Act

Communities that have historically borne the worst effects of pollution due to redlining and institutional racism shouldn't continue to bear the ongoing harm being inflicted on their health, well-being, and even life expectancy today. Yet under current laws, the process that permits businesses to pollute is not required to consider the effects of our history of environmental racism and the cumulative health risk and burden the most impacted communities face. We all suffer when we allow these environmental injustices to continue, but we can do something about it:

The CURB (Cumulative Risk Burden) Pollution Act

Requires the consideration of pollutants affecting health that currently go unaddressed

Specifies communities that have been disproportionately harmed by pollution for specific protections

Requires a lead agency to deny permit applications for new facilities that add cumulative pollution effects and work with applicants seeking permit renewals that add cumulative pollution effects, with the goal to reduce pollution over time

Elevates voices of community members through frontline community participation in permit evaluations process

Applying the Principles of HEAL in Permitting

Washington State recently passed the Healthy Environmental for All (HEAL) Act which embeds Environmental Justice into state agency policies, budgets, and plans. The law would take HEAL a step further by requiring that environmental justice be directly applied in pollution permitting.

Multiple states have begun adopting legislation that adds stringency to and enhances public participation in the pollution permitting process, all with the express acknowledgment that cumulative impacts must be dealt with. Washington now has a chance not only to join these states, but to help lead the path going forward for the nation.
